To live out our commitments, we practice clarity and consistency with compensation throughout every step of our hiring process, and are strictly negotiation-free. All salaries are based on job responsibilities coupled with a calculation of the amount of same job experience a candidate brings to the role. Past salaries and negotiations have no impact at all on someone’s salary at MediaJustice.

Instead, we are up front with all candidates about the same-level experience salary tiers for the role, and candidates can be confident that they are receiving highly competitive wages and that they are being paid comparable to their colleagues. Once hired, employees will know that their years of experience in the role will automatically lead to Tier-based salary increases with no additional negotiation or labor required on the part of the employee. We implemented this values based salary framework to disrupt employment practices that have historically worked against people of color, Indigenous, women and gender nonconforming folx.

MediaJustice has an in-depth salary philosophy, which includes:

Salary Framework

- To combat structural pay inequities, we practice transparency around our pay scale and practice negotiation-free salary processes with individual candidates and staff members.
- We pay highly competitive wages, benchmarking our salaries to some of the most highly-compensated markets in the country (i.e. New York City, Washington, D. C., San Francisco)
- Strive to pay in the top 25th percentile or better for all roles at MediaJustice.
- We compensate new and existing staff for their experience, and set salaries to reflect the same-level work experience that our people bring to their role.
- Annual raises - with an aim of 2% whenever feasible - equally to all MediaJustice staff, and adjust our salary framework accordingly.
